What is RD20

Launched in 2019, the RD20 — Research and Development 20 — is an “initiative” (framework) for international research and development aiming to strengthen international collaboration by leading research institutes in G20 countries and regions that develop the world’s most advanced technologies for achieving carbon neutrality.

RD20 provides opportunities for participants to exchange experiences of best practices in R&D related to clean energy technologies across countries and regions, as well as to explore the potential for international joint research. It also serves to deepen and develop new partnerships among relevant industry, academia, and government stakeholders.

Actions for Collaboration of RD20

The Summer School, as one of the RD20’s five areas of collaboration activity, was launched in 2023. The goal of the activity is promoting a common culture and deeper understanding of carbon neutrality among young researchers within the G20 countries and regions.
